A Word to Our Neighbors Who Drink.

There are a number of young men and boys-and some old men-who have a weakness for intoxicating liquor. Their friends try to conceal and forget the fact, but every once in a while we are reminded of it again in some way that makes us realize what a terrible thing it is for a man to put into his mouth that which will rob him of his judgement.

We have a good law in the Glade precinct, forbidding the keeping of a saloon, and it is not long since this law was ratified by an overwhelming vote of our citizens. A large number of men who drink voted for the law. We all realize that it is a temptation, a corruption, seduction, to have liquor sold in a saloon.

> Fortunately, a parent need not be infallible-woe to him should he claim to be!-in order to stimulate to helpful imitation. But he must be self-controlled, and he must not juggle common sense. Either of these is fatal to the relation between parent and child, because respect and confidence cannot thrive under such conditions.

A child is observant, and most ready to draw conclusions. Said a thoughtful girl: "When I was very young, my mother was to me the iufallible standard of right. As I grew older I saw that she sometimes made mistakes, so, while she lost infallibility, she gained more love. As I grew and my experiences reached out in Mrs. Frankie Whaley is able to directions hers did not, she consulted me, and had regard to my opinions, until there grew up between us the most perfect friendship of my life."

Now a parent's claim that what is wrong for the child is permissible for himself; that his outburst of anger is justifiable while the child's is punishable; that, in short, the child must do as he says, not as he does,-this strikes at the very root of the imitative faculty, and excites, first distrust,

Two little girls, sisters, were candidates for prizes offered by a small church for correct recitation of a children's catechism. The recitation was to be made before the assembled congregation. The younger girl answered every question promptly, the elder girl stumbled several times, and at the close of the test, humiliated by failure, she turned and slapped her sister in the face. The mother sitting near, drew the offender to her side, and, with eyes flashing anger, "gave her as good as she had

On leaving the church later, she said to an acquaintance, "I'm so ashamed of Annie, but I mean to make her more ashamed of herself when I get her home."

"Please don't, Mrs. Jackson," said the lady addressed. "We are all sorry for Annie: you showed us how little she was to blame."

The anger faded to perplexity in the mother's face. Let us hope she found the meaning of the reproof, and learned for her encouragement that self-control is contagious, and that courtesy produces after its kind. Rebecca Smylie, in S. S. Times.

Since this is true in the case of a teacher of little children, how much more must it be true in the case of county, state, or nation. Our lawyers, ministers, judges, and statesmen are simply teachers on a large scale. The lawyer has to convince the jury that his cause is just, the statesman must teach the nation his theory of gevernment and show the people that it is practical and wise.

What does a forest fire mean?

To many it means a risk to hundreds of rods of rails which will take days of hard labor to replace. Now and then a fodder stack is caught or a stable burned. Beyond these risks little thought is given to a far greater damage which is sure to follow.

The destruction of young growing timber is of such vast and far reaching importance as to outweigh many times the other harmful results of forest fires.

Still nature is lavish of her productions in this favored forest region; with the mild temperature which prevails and the ample rain fall together with abundant sunshine, young trees spring up with an actual exuberance to take the place of those cut, and in the young men of the community, a few years the scars of a season's logging are closed over and another forest crop well unnder way, if-ah, that fatal if comes in:- If the fires can be kept out and nature given a chance. But how often this fails of being the case. Apparently this must is an excellent star and pines over the entire tract. rather there was until recently.

The last time I was by there I read as plainly as from a printed page a far too common story. A roughly built log cabin, stick chimney carried a winding streak of blackened timber. Which course will you pursue? Every forest fire then if it does not destroy what is at present called property or value for somebody, is really discounting the wealth of the next generation both in the timber that should be theirs and in the very soil in which the trees and crops should grow. If the boys who are coming on are to have stave timber, walnut logs, spoke billets, and lumber to market the young trees must be growing now that are to produce them. To allow these to burn is, in
